

2013 ANNUAL REPORT

30 years of investing in the promise of sonoma county

COMMUNITY FOUNDATION
SONOMA COUNTY

2013

Dear Friends,

Results, stewardship, and legacy are some of the bywords that we consider each year as we prepare this annual report to share with you. We also consider dates and milestones to help put your partnership with the Community Foundation into perspective. We are excited about what we've achieved with your help and strive to build upon our history to do more.

Our roots run deep. Community Foundation Sonoma County was founded in 1983 with a modest $9,000 in start-up monies. The first grants were made in 1984, with $1,500 each distributed in support of the arts, education, environment, and human services—the four core areas we still serve most robustly today.

2013 was a big year, as it was Community Foundation Sonoma County's 30th anniversary, the 10th anniversary of our Healdsburg Area Fund, and the 7th year of the Sonoma Valley Fund. Over the course of three decades, we're proud that Community Foundation Sonoma County and its two affiliates have distributed over $128 million in funding to our area and made more than 11,000 grants here at home and beyond.

Through the generosity of our donors, we distributed $10.4 million in 2013 to nonprofit organizations committed to improving the lives of all who live here. Their work runs the gamut, from providing educational programs for students to preserving our open spaces to providing access to the arts to ensuring daily support of basic human needs. We continued to seek ways to leverage funding, ideas, and partnerships through initiatives such as Cradle to Career and Upstream Investments. We were also a key collaborator in the inaugural ieSonoma event, bringing together hundreds of educators and leaders with internationally known speakers for the purpose of making Sonoma County a leader in innovation and creativity in education.

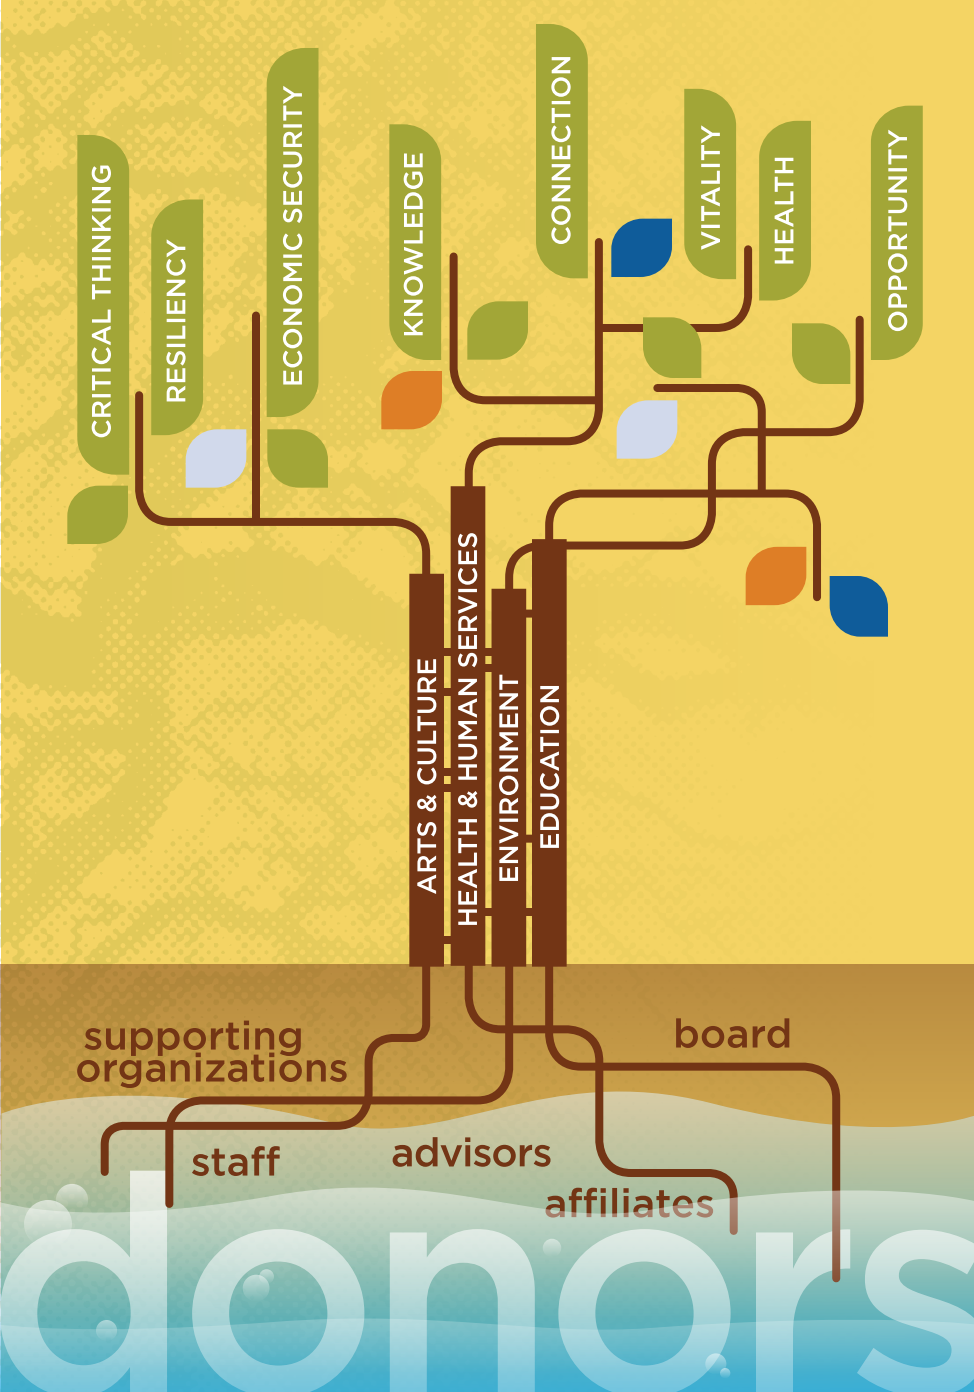

As we look back on the past 30 years and forward to the coming decades, we see a renewed community charter of charitable giving in perpetuity to assist our neighbors, strengthen our towns and cities, and support the lives of every individual fortunate enough to reside in Sonoma County. We're so grateful to you for placing your trust in Community Foundation Sonoma County. It's our honor to participate in such a richness of vision, philanthropy, and legacy as you have guided us to serve.

CREATING LEGACY

GEORGE TUTTLE & BEN CUSHMAN

With Pinot Noir vineyards spread out below him, George Tuttle sits on his porch and surveys the West County home he shares with spouse Ben Cushman.

When asked to explain his philanthropy, he shakes his head. "The guilt factor is pretty high when you're sitting here in Sonoma County on your nice deck and all of these awful things are going on all around the world," he says.

Ben says, "Philanthropy is a learned practice that feeds on itself and, in my case, George was the one who made it clear many years ago that this was important." He smiles. "I was not a hard case to convert."

George is a retired corporate attorney; Ben is a retired CEO now active in nonprofit board work. The couple moved from San Francisco to Sonoma County permanently in 2005. Looking to become involved with their new community, they came to the Community Foundation.

Education, hunger, the international refugee crisis, and civil rights are among the causes dear to their hearts, and sitting on the porch ignoring those needs is simply not an option.

In 2013, the couple was introduced to the Giving Circle concept by the Community Foundation and chose to support the LGBTQI community. "I'm excited about having the Community Foundation provide leadership in terms of bringing opportunities to us," Ben says of this new Giving Circle.

"For us," Ben says, "there's always a struggle around: Are we doing enough? Are we giving enough? Can we be doing more? We don't have an answer," he says, looking at George. "We live that question all the time."

FAMILY GIVING

DEAN & BELINDA SOILAND

Family is paramount to Dean and Belinda (Bo) Soiland. So is faith. Dean, like most of his siblings, got his start in his father Marv Soiland's sand and gravel business before he and Bo launched their BoDean Company for aggregates and asphalt in 1989. Along the way, they had three children of their own while supporting several children in South and Central America. And through it all, good times and bad, they have always given 10 percent of their income away.

Dean credits his upbringing for their habit of tithing. Bo's mother had to seek welfare when she and her three siblings were children. She was embarrassed by the help then, but understands it now. "That translates today into me having compassion for people who don't have the means and the gifts that we do in our business," she says.

Because family is paramount, Dean and Bo have brought their three children, ages 25, 23, and 15, into the philanthropic fold. "I see the Foundation as being an entity that helps our children with the whole component of giving and serving," Dean says. "I listen to Bo talk to our oldest son, and she tells him, it's not about yourself. It's about learning to give to others."

The couple feel that involving their children in their own estate planning and Community Foundation giving has also helped ease them into adulthood.

Bo says, "We don't want to leave everything to our kids. We would love to give it all to charity. Hopefully, our children will be able to pick that up and learn for themselves the joy of giving!"

COMMUNITY RESOURCE

LA LUZ CENTER

When activist Ligia Booker founded La Luz Center in 1985, the Sonoma Valley Latino population was largely transient, composed of seasonal workers who returned to their native countries once the harvest was done.

By 2013, however, the community had stabilized. Serving some 10,000 people a year, La Luz now focuses its resources on helping year-round Latino citizens live better lives in the U.S.

"We're shifting from the 'give the fish' model to teaching our clients how to fish," says La Luz Executive Director Juan Hernandez. "The organization is really responsive to what's happening in the community."

And what's happening in the community is that, as the population has put down roots, its needs have grown and changed. While La Luz used to mainly offer emergency assistance to their clients, they now extend such long-term help as filing tax returns, navigating the Affordable Care Act, teaching computer literacy and parenting skills, and offering English as a Second Language (ESL) courses.

The Community Foundation granted La Luz $93,500 in 2013, the vast majority of which came from the Roland and Hazel Todd Fund, specifically earmarked for La Luz's ESL program.

"One of the cycles we're trying to break is the cycle of parents not knowing English. Their kid is translating everything," Juan says of the program. "And then the power dynamics shift within the family."

The County of Sonoma gave La Luz a Jefferson Award in 2013 in recognition of their decades of service. It was a gesture that resonates.

Juan says, "We've been in existence for 29 years but that made us feel validated. It's like people finally know who we are."

SONOMA VALLEY FUND

Established in 2007, the Sonoma Valley Fund aims to grow and preserve the philanthropic traditions and life quality of its community. The Sonoma Valley Fund seeks to assuage the challenges and increase the opportunities for all.

To that end, this affiliate works with 22 nonprofit partners, helping them to develop endowment and legacy giving programs. The Fund hosted an Antiques Roadshow-style event and programming to draw attention to the estate value of collectibles whose proceeds were donated to our local nonprofit partners.

Community Foundation Sonoma County and the Sonoma Valley Fund have awarded more than $2.7 million in grants and scholarships since the Fund's inception, giving over half a million in 2013. A vigorous bequest campaign has engaged 37 area individuals and families in a planned giving program. The Sonoma Valley Fund provides an important lifeline to its resident community and offers unprecedented opportunities to enjoy an enhanced life for all in this very special corner of Sonoma County.

HEALDSBURG AREA FUND

Our North County affiliate, serving both Healdsburg and Geyserville, celebrated its first decade in 2013 with a bang, launching the Healdsburg Legacy Challenge in active outreach to citizens interested in doing what Harmon Heald himself did: changing North County for the better.

We're grateful that residents Barbara Grassechi and Tony Crabb, Jane and Herb Dwight, and an anonymous donor have all stepped forward, offering to match 10 percent of all future gift promises made today up to $100,000. This kind of generosity and investment in North County is among the reasons that the Healdsburg Area Fund is so robust and effective.

Since its inception in 2003, this Community Foundation affiliate has granted some $433,000 to 33 nonprofit organizations. With a $1.3 million endowment, the Healdsburg Area Fund gave over $80,000 to 18 nonprofits in 2013. Such giving showcases what Community Foundations do best, which is to know exactly what the needs of its citizens are and to serve them nimbly.
